Biographical sketch

America participated in the Second World War from 1941-1945. During this time, Americans, and American institutions, underwent a strict rationing program, which included a ration on food, materials such as rubber, wood, and metal, and medicine. To ensure every American was following the rationing program, President Roosevelt created several government bureaucracies to regulate the demand of certain items and the price that items sell for on the market. Each government bureaucracy coordinated with state and private institutions to ensure that the institutions, the employees, and the students, were following these rationing guidelines and to ensure that such institutions could easily adapt to the changes the war was to bring. To ensure the comfort and the effectiveness of the Teachers College, college officials corresponded with the government.
