Historical Information

Following Congress' enacting of the District of Columbia Home Rule Act on December 24, 1973 public works for D.C. were provided by four city agencies: The Department of Environment, the Department of General Services, the Department of Transportation, and the Office of Surveys. In April 1980, Mayor Marion Barry proposed merging these four agencies into a single agency known as the Department of Public Works, but it was not until December 1983, after the plan had been scaled back to include the merger of only the Department of Environment Services and the Department of Transportation, that the new Department of Public Works was created. Today the District of Columbia Department of Public Works (DPW) oversees solid waste and recyclables collection, street cleaning, parking enforcement, and governmental vehicle procurement, maintenance, and fueling.

Scope and Content

Double-sided informational map titled "A Transportation Vision, Strategy, and Action Plan for the Nation's Capital" published by the Washington, D.C. Department of Public Works introducing and describing a new strategic transportation plan for the District of Columbia. This 20-year strategic vision and action plan was created in part to fulfill Federal regulations requiring D.C. to have a regularly updated long-range transportation plan.

One side includes five columns of text detailing the strategic vision and action plan, as well as the title page for when the map is folded. The other side includes a map of the District of Columbia, with corresponding Legend, showing many of the specific actions detailed in the Action Plan on the reverse side and a small section at the bottom labeled "Conceptual Cross Sections" that represents ways these Action Plans could be implemented.
