Administration History

James Madison University's Public Relations Department, now known as University Marketing and Branding, was created in 1967, headed by Richard C. Mandeville and overseen by the executive assistant to the president. The creation of this department was part of the major reorganization of the college in 1967 and one of its main concerns was information services. The Public Relations Department became the Department of Public Services in 1972. This department was headed by Ray V. Sonner, who oversaw the Office of Public Information which was responsible for sending press releases and pictures to off-campus media including the Daily News-Record. In 1973, sports information and public information each became a distinct office under the Department of Public Services. In 1976, the offices of sports information and public information were combined. Throughout this time, Sonner supervised the Department of Public and Sports Information, headed by Richard Murray and Milla Sue Wisecarver. Since 1984, the office that directed the public relations of the university has changed names many times.

Scope and Contents

Scope and Contents

The Office of Public Affairs Records consists of 25 boxes of press releases that are separated by general press releases and sports press releases. These press releases contain announcements of events on campus, general news items, results from athletic competitions, university budgets, Marching Royal Dukes news, etc. While the press releases are separated by content (sports and general), some press releases created by the sports information office may be interfiled with general press releases.
